L.O: To create an atmosphere of excitement in our writing

The work we've been doing is all building up to us being able to write as if we are part of the crowd waiting to see Zeraffa. We need to capture the excitement in our writing - we need the reader to feel our excitement.

Think about how you might feel the night before the arrival of Zeraffa.

Let's do a brain storm of all the things we might feel. We'll write down any ideas for language, phrases and sentences you might want to use in your writing to describe the wait the night before.

- In our writing we are going to try and use;
- Shorter sentences
- Focus on my thoughts and feelings
- Questions to myself wondering about what might happen

With your help I am now going to have a go at writing a shared model.

I am going to display some sentence starters in addition to our brainstorm to help us.

While I am writing think about how exciting it is.

Is there anything I could change to make it more exciting?

Now that we have written a model together.
It's over to you.

Using the model to help you, write some ideas of your own down in your general books.

When we have finished we will share some of our ideas and give each other feedback.

(Remember to not go past waking up)
